Even Doodling Is Checked to Guard Secrets

Curlicues Drawn
by Officials Are Burned as Security Measure.

WASHINGTON.

UNCLE SAM'S security system is now so strict that even doodling by high officials is checked to make sure their subconscious scribbling doesn't reveal any secrets. The doodles usually are burned if they are drawn during a secret conference.

Washington's champion doodler, Secretary of State John Foster Dulles, draws complex geometric designs as he thinks. It isn't likely these abstract patterns would give away any secrets. But, on the chance a psychologist might get a clue to Dulles's secret thinking from them, aids scrupulously gather up his doodles and stuff them into a briefcase after each meeting.

Secretary of Defense Charles E. Wilson also doodles at his desk. He may jot down a word or figure or curlicue, but his staff doesn't bother to pick it up after him. They are convinced his doodling would only confuse enemy agents.

Sensitive agencies, such as the Atomic Energy Commission and Central Intelligence Agency, automatically destroy all doodling or scribbling that has anything to do with secret work.

Atomic Energy Chairman Lewis Strauss does not doodle, but he scrawls notes on tiny white pads and stuffs them in his pockets. He even keeps a pad by his bedside in case he should get an idea in the middle of the night. But he always empties his pockets in his office and is careful to destroy notes that contain security information.

Central Intelligence Chief Allen Dulles scribbles notes on sheets of long, lined yellow paper. His security-minded staff takes no chances and simply incinerates all his waste paper.

The same is true in other secret offices around Washington. Even doodling is often classified as "Top Secret."
